For example, K. Y. Chang et al., "A 2.times.4 MEG CMOS Technology with 0.3um Process", IEDM Tech. Dig., pp. 443-446, Dec. 1985, proposes that a gate oxide layer be formed on a 2.times.4 MEG portion of a Si wafer. An n-well of polysilicon is then formed on the gate oxide layer, and then the substrate is doped to form the drain and source regions. The doped substrate is then etched by RIE to form channels, and the channel oxide layer is then formed. The oxide layer is etched to form a polysilicon layer corresponding to the gates, and a SiO.sub.2 layer is formed to complete the CMOS process. This process is able to produce two devices on a wafer, but only on the 2.times.4 portion of the wafer. Also, the channel oxide layer is formed after the polysilicon layer is etched, and it is not certain that the residual organic species in the channel oxide layer do not poison the devices. Furthermore, the RIE etching step forms an undercut in the polysilicon layer, which is then used to pattern the gates, and it is not always possible to obtain a uniform pattern across the wafer. Finally, while the fabrication process can be reduced to a two-step process, the two-step process requires that the gate oxide layer be formed on the 2.times.4 portion of the wafer, which adds processing steps to the process.
