This invention relates to new and useful improvements in apparatus used to coat dye receptive textile fibers with a dyestuff as soon as they have been pulled from a textile machine, such as a doffer. In prior art techniques, the most common type of coater has comprised an elongate trough having a broad bottom and side walls. This coater is usually placed vertically so that the yarn to be dyed is caused to fall into the coater as it is withdrawn from the doffer or whatever other type of textile machine is used. This coating device may be rotated in order to obtain the desired uniform coating of the yarns.

In a typical prior art process, the proper mixing of dyestuff and water is effected in a mixing chamber of the type having means to dilute the dyes, and a reservoir tank in which the dye-water mixture is stored. It is usual for this mixing chamber to have an oval cross-section, with a diameter substantially less than the diameter of the reservoir tank. After this mixing, a pump is utilized to force the dye solution through a dye path to the coater which is usually positioned above the mixing chamber. If this dye path is long or if it branches into many lengths, it is at least normally necessary to provide a series of valves or shut-off devices to control the flow of dye solution to the coater. These valves or shut-off devices usually comprise a set of spaced, relatively close-fitting plates, or shut-off plates, and these are located at the outlet of the dye path so that they may be actuated to open and close the dye outlet. The plates are usually arranged in a single, longitudinally extending row or series of rows, and they are actuated by hand or by a simple rod or chain. In a typical arrangement, the dye path leads to the trough of the coater which has an oval cross-section and a diameter slightly greater than the cross-sectional diameter of the dye path. The dye path is normally located at the bottom of the trough, and the inlet of the dye solution is generally positioned at the top of the trough so that the dyestuff solution will flow into the coater. This solution then flows over the coater, and it is often necessary to have a series of baffles or other type of screening means in order to prevent, or at least minimize, the formation of dye droplets which may be deposited on a screen or platen at the outlet of the trough. In the past
