The program can perform many edits that are commonly performed in other image-editing applications. In addition to providing image-editing capabilities, Photoshop also boasts special features, tools, and plug-ins that enable users to create special effects in Adobe After Effects (AE) and create composite images with the help of Adobe's Bridge software. After Effects can produce movie, video, and animation content. Bridge is an image-management system that also enables exporting content to other digital-media formats. Adobe offers Photoshop for macOS, Windows, Android, and iOS platforms. Discovering Photoshop's various capabilities Photoshop offers a variety of tools that enable you to perform a number of common image-editing tasks. In this section, I describe the key tools in Adobe Photoshop CS6 and share how they can be used in other image-editing programs. Don't be surprised if you find a tool (such as the eyedropper tool) that you need in a different color space. For example, the Tool Options dialog box lets you choose which color space is used for conversions — for example, RGB, HSL, or CMYK. Color Balancing and Color Correction One of the most common image-editing tools that people commonly use is the color-balance tool. This tool enables you to balance colors in an image, or correct them by making them darker or brighter. The tool enables you to correct the color in either the RGB or HSL color space. Most image editors (including Photoshop) include the Color Balance command. However, the tool provides a color-correction feature that's extremely powerful and allows you to make adjustments that exceed the tool's built-in color-correction options. The Color Balance dialog box When you open the Color Balance dialog box, shown in Figure 1-1, you see a preview of the image and some information about the current color setting. The dialog box includes the following settings: White Balance: Select the white-balance setting you want the image to use. You can select these options from three panels on the left side of the dialog box: Auto, Kelvin, and ICM (Intelligent Color Management). In this example, the white balance is set to Auto. • Auto: The program attempts to make a guess about the white balance setting based on the colors in the image. You may see the results of this guess in the preview pane of the Color Balance dialog box.

The invention relates to methods for testing software products. Routinely, tests of software are conducted that interact with software applications during the execution of the application. Routinely, to interact with the application, code that causes the application to "respond" to the test is executed. Responses from the application include responses that cause the application to perform a specific function, or a function in response to a specific input. Routinely, the code of the application includes a code for determining the location in the code of the test functions. To interact with the application, the application is run and, using this code, the test is run. To gain information concerning the location of the test functions, the code of the application is turned on and the location of the test function is determined. This can be done manually, or automatically. When the code of the application is turned on, it is important that a correct instruction is run. The "correct" instructions may be determined by checking to see if code that causes the application to respond to the test is being executed. One problem with the manually determining the location of the test function is that instructions are not run in the correct order. In other words, it is possible that the instructions which are not called first may be called after the instructions which are called first. This can lead to test failures. When the code of the application is automatically tested, the location of the test function is sometimes determined incorrectly. The test application is run and, as part of the run, a different test function is run. Because of the nature of the test application, the test program has the ability to run and change the code of the application, even though the test program is checking to see if the code of the application is being run. The test application modifies the code in the application to have the application react to the test program. This means that the application is made to test the test program instead of the actual program. In this regard, the test program is run first and, when the test program is finished, the code of the application is changed by the test application. Because of this, the location of the test function is sometimes determined incorrectly. In the case where the location of the test function is not determined correctly, the test is run and, because the application is not responding to the test as it should, the test fails. Sometimes, the test failed because the code of the application was changed by the test application. In this case, the

JUBA, Sudan (AP) — Three people were killed and 16 others were injured in an attack on a mosque in Sudan's central Darfur region Sunday, a local health official said. The attack occurred in Jebel Marra town in the Jebel Marra state east of Nyala city, one of the main population centers in Darfur's eastern Nyala area. It came two days after a similar attack, in which four people were killed and 21 others were wounded by suspected rebels in the town of Didinga in Jebel Marra state. The locals, who were originally preparing for a wedding, were attacked while they were praying at the mosque and a local official said the attackers used Kalashnikov machine guns, unidentified guns and rocket-propelled grenades. "The town has suffered frequent attacks by al-Qaida-linked forces," Darfur state health director Abdel Ghani Mustafa told The Associated Press. U.S. news agencies said Sunday that two leaders of the Sudanese opposition are accusing the country's U.S.-backed transitional government of perpetrating the attack on the mosque. "We are sure that it was not al-Qaida because it is known to us that al-Qaida does not spare civilians," said Yahia al-Amin, head of the Sudan Liberation Movement in Western Sudan, the most powerful armed opposition group. Amin said the attack occurred in "an area of Muslim soldiers of the armed police (who are part of the military wing of the country's ruling party, the National Congress Party).... People gather in this area on Fridays during the prayers." U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, who's on her fourth visit to Sudan, has promised $20 million in extra aid to help improve the country's ability to track the movement of weapons and people. She said Sunday that $4.7 million in promised assistance will be used to improve security and combat illegal arms trade. She said she hopes to see "a greater commitment to peace and security.... A cessation of hostilities to make it easier for Sudanese to get to school and for their education in school." Clinton spoke in suburban London with Ahmed Haroun, the new leader of the Sudanese opposition, who urged the U.S. and other powers to pressure the Sudanese to halt their attacks on each other's villages and towns. U.N. officials said Friday that at least 600 people have died in inter
