An actuation mechanism is coupled to the handle and moves a tripping mechanism on the handle when the handle is rotated. The tripping mechanism engages an operating mechanism of the circuit breaker in response to an operating handle position to open the circuit breaker and this has the effect of actuating at least one armature of an electromagnet of the operating mechanism. The electromagnet, in turn, causes a trip bar to move, which causes a swingable armature to move, which in turn opens a separable contact disposed on the armature. The separable contact has a movable armature or finger that engages the tripping mechanism to prevent movement of the armature. As a result, when the movable armature and finger are engaged by the tripping mechanism, the separable contact is closed and the circuit breaker is open, preventing a load current from flowing. On the other hand, when the handle is rotated away from the tripping mechanism and the tripping mechanism is disengaged from the movable armature, the movable armature moves to open the separable contact, and the circuit breaker is closed so that the load current can flow. This known type of circuit breaker also has a movable stop connected to the handle. When the handle is rotated to one extreme position, the movable stop acts as a limit switch to stop the circuit breaker in that extreme position. The movable stop is normally positioned where it is disengaged from the separable contact. A commonly used form of movable stop includes an armature that engages the separable contact and moves in a first direction on the armature as the handle is rotated until the

This is the highest level of optimism among Americans since 2009, but it's still lower than the proportion saying that in September 2012, when the nation was in the throes of a disastrous economic downturn that had been building for more than a year. Today's result is also only slightly higher than the 66% who thought the economy would improve one year ago. These numbers follow a summer of rising optimism, just as Americans were expecting the economy to be worse than it had been in the past. What accounts for the increase? The explanation lies in the impact of the election itself. It may be that simply the prospect of change makes people feel better, or that as "change" becomes a more realistic goal after a divisive election, hope returns. Regardless, the fact that greater optimism has returned to the economy is good news for the country going into the next year. The stories Americans are telling each other about the economy may also be a factor. For example, more people now say they are better off financially than a year ago. Furthermore, the share of Americans who describe their financial situations as "poor" or "not at all well off" is the lowest it has been since 1999, and down from 2007 and 2011. Americans' descriptions of their economic situation have improved over time, so no one is probably much poorer today than they were in 2007, but the improvement suggests the economy has not yet turned the corner. Political views and expectations about the economy are closely tied. For example, more Democrats than Republicans and independents expect the economy to improve over the next year, and independents' optimism is more negative than that of Republicans and Democrats. Democrats also have a more positive view of their personal financial situation than do Republicans or independents, which tracks with recent history. The public's current views of the country's direction might also play a role. Fifty-nine percent of Americans today believe the country is on the wrong track, a number that is d0c515b9f4
