I get off the train at Millennium Station. I emerge onto a street lined with shops and apartments where streetlamps still cast their lines. It is almost night, but I don't need to watch the sky. I know what's out there. There's a particular coldness in the air that comes with being the furthest north. I can feel it even without relying on the weather app on my phone. There's a particular coldness in the air that comes with being the furthest north. I think of my dad, of the trip we took together when I was small. In the summer he wore short sleeves and wide-brimmed hats. He told me, over and over again, that he loved winter. I wonder if he's happy.
