A "known" technique for fabricating high dielectric constant layers is to form a metal oxide layer on a wafer in a manner that causes the metal oxide layer to be formed into a rough film, and then subsequently to make the wafer undergo an anneal. The rough film is formed, e.g., by oxidizing the surface of the wafer using an oxygen plasma, or by oxidizing the wafer using gaseous ozone. The wafer is then placed into a furnace for a period of time and at a temperature sufficient to cause the metal oxide to crystallize. Although this known technique can be effective, it does have some drawbacks. Because the anneal must be performed at high temperatures, the wafer can be damaged. Also, because the anneal must be performed over an extended period of time, throughput is not optimal. Moreover, because the rough film is formed using chemical oxidation processes, the size and shape of the rough film cannot be controlled, leading to films having varying thicknesses and inhomogeneities. It is thus desirable to develop improved techniques for fabricating metal oxide layers. This invention relates to a method of and apparatus 2edc1e01e8
